of the Public A Demand for Reform. Twentieth century sports are bound to be even more attractive, it is thought, than those of recent years. The hustness of conducting sporting events has gradually developed into a profession, whereas it was not so very long are that the monetary end of the game | Besides these trophies there were magnums was an insignificant feature. As Father of wine to inspire the riders to make the Time lops off the years many sports now in their infancy will be developed. The growth of baseball during the latter part of the past century is a typical illustration. From a erude game, without science and devoid of skill, it grew into a national pastime, which not only attracted thousands of Americans, but also made it possible for the promoters to andsome profits. But baseball is in the hands of incompetents now, and with the birth of a new century the outlook is any. but promising. Many persons have said that the national game is slowly dving, and that in course of time it will be practically eta. But this is hard to believe, as it is . bealthful outdoor exercise for those who play it and a most entertaining amusement the unlookers. By sportsmanlike management and the wiping out of evils that have disgusted the public, the game, it is believed, se made perpetual in its popularity hat result is realized a new broom should sweep the council chambers clean of sent baseball is suffering from marrels among promoters and at nobody cares what becomes a discouraging state of affairs begin a new era of progress.

HANLEY'S NOVEL IDEAS He Would Build a Cap Defender With 40-Feet

C. C. Hanley, who has designed a 90-foot floop which, if the necessary money is sub-scribed, will be built for the defence of the America's Cup, talked freely to a reporter of the Boston Herald about his design. He

s no maninthis country stands anything like an even chance with Herreshoff. Any designer o the discomforts of the competitors. In Herreshoff's footsteps. Why, even if Herre shoff should give the plans of his new hoat to another designer that designer would not have an even chance. "Herreshoff, building his own boat and knowing every detail of her plans and con-struction, has a tremendous advantage He knows why he is making every change from the Columbia's model and just what he expects those changes to accomplish. Any ther designer following his type is obliged to guess to an extent on these conclusions 'Think of the big keel sloops that he has built-the Colonia, the Defender and the Columbla-and the opport mity be has had to study them down to the most minute detail. Is it reasonable to suppose that any one else can step in and on his first trial beat Herreis to beat him by an experiment, or, in other words, by doing something different. In stead of following in his footsteps, with but little chance of catching up, strike off on some
